"Dwat it!" Elmer Fudd stormed one day, as he stood in the middle of his pumpkin patch with Daffy Duck. "Some wascal has been stealing pumpkins fwom me again!"

"Don't fret, friend," Daffy said soothingly. "Fortunately for you I know of a real smart fellow around here who can solve this mystery for you . . . Me!"

"You!" Elmer snorted with disdain. "The only pwoblem you can solve is how to make a pest of yourself."

"Yes, but I work so cheap you can't lose," Daffy countered. "Just a crust of bread and a pat on the back."

"Nothing doing!"

"Then how about a dog biscuit?"

"A thousand times no!" Elmer hollered. "I'll catch the wetched wascal who's wobbing me if I have to stay up all night to guard this garden myself."

"You'd better not," Daffy advised. "You look kind of peaked from lack of sleep as it is. A person needs his sleep, you know."

"I know," Elmer nodded with a frown. "The stwange part of it is that I've been getting to bed good and early, but I wake up feeling tired in the morning. I wonder why."

"Beats me, buddy, but I'll make you a promise," Daffy offered. "Tonight, I'll guard your pumpkin patch myself."

True to his promise, Daffy was on the job later that evening. The night was dark and moonless, and, after a few hours of his lonely vigil, Daffy began to yawn and nod his head. Then he saw a shadowy figure approaching.

"Halt!" he cried shakily.

"Pardon the intwusion, my fwiend," said the late visitor, "but do you have a flashlight?"

"Say, your voice is familiar," Daffy exclaimed. "Have we met?"

"I don't weckon so," the shadowy figure chuckled, his features still obscured by the darkness. "Unless you include pumpkin pinchers among your acquaintances. That's my pwofession, you know. Well, excuse me while I get about my wascally business."

The stranger advanced into the garden and picked up a pumpkin.

"I know him from somewhere," Daffy mumbled, as he followed the figure. "Ooops!" he gasped. "He's not only a pumpkin pincher, he's a housebreaker, too. He's gone right up to Elmer's cellar door and opened it."

Daffy lowered his head and charged at the indistinct figure. He hit him between the shoulders and they both tumbled down the cellar steps into the storage bin.

As Daffy flopped around, trying to keep ahold of his quarry, one of his wings caught the light chain, and suddenly the room was filled with light.

Daffy looked at the mysterious intruder and gasped with surprise. "Elmer!" he exclaimed. "What are you doing here?"

"That's what I'd like to know, too," Elmer said with a puzzled glance at a pile of pumpkins in a corner. "And what are all these pumpkins doing here?"

"Wait a minute," Daffy giggled. "I understand what happened, now, and it explains everything. You've been walking in your sleep and pinching your own pumpkins, Clyde!"

"Gwacious," Elmer sighed. "This is weally embawwassing. No wonder I've been so tired every morning, lately. I guess there's only one thing worse than being a sleepwalker, and that's to be a sleepstealer — especially when you're stealing both sleep and pumpkins from yourself."
